Hopelessness is a well-documented correlate of suicidal behavior, but there is a lack of research literature on the topic of hopelessness in the adolescent population. This article gives an overview of research on hopelessness in adolescence, with an emphasis on the clinical meaning of hopelessness in this population. Symptoms of hopelessness appear to be fairly common in adolescents. In adolescents with mood disorders, hopelessness is a good predictor of suicide attempts, completions, and ideation. In adolescents without mood disorders, hopelessness is related to a number of indicators of poor functioning, including school performance, and maladaptive behaviors such as polysubstance use and delinquency. The relationships between hopelessness and psychosocial adjustment appear to be bidirectional in nature; hopelessness itself may also be predictive of poor outcomes. Treatments aimed at improving hopelessness are also reviewed. Empirical findings are more favorable when hopelessness is targeted in combination with depression, especially in patients with suicidal tendencies. Treatment efforts can increase hope and decrease hopelessness. There is a need for further research on both the measurement of and interventions for hopelessness in adolescents.[Functional properties of the myocardium in a clinical example of metabolic myocardial dystrophy]. The functional properties of myocardium in a clinical case of "metabolic" myocardial dystrophy was investigated using the standard stress tests. The study found the following: a) in the examination of the right ventricle with the help of coronarography and angiographic findings the patient had insignificant coronary atherosclerosis, hypovascularization in the subendocardium and hypoperfusion on the "slow"
